Pork packing: Just what is capacity?

COVID-19 presents obstacles that may linger

A FUNDAMENTAL CHALLENGE in determining the total capacity of the U.S. pork packing sector in 2020 is defining just what capacity is. My traditional question of "How many hogs can you harvest in a day if margins are good and hogs are plentiful?" simply doesn't address all of the constraints packers have faced in a COVID-19 world.

At the very least, the qualifier "if labor wasn't a constraint" was required this year. In some instances "if carbon dioxide availability wasn't a constraint" had to be added as well.

The first qualifier was necessary in just about every case. The second was more significant with sow slaughter plants where carbon dioxide is used to chill pre-rigor (i.e., hot-boned) product that is widely preferred for whole-hog sausage products. Among plants that reported enough labor to operate kill floors at optimal levels, many were short of labor on boning lines and in byproduct capture operations.

Packers were asked to provide capacity figures that fully incorporate any changes that have been made to accommodate COVID-19 prevention and control. Though these changes may not be permanent, they are in place today and will be so for the foreseeable future.

So, while this year's data represent a reasonable number of hogs that can be harvested by the physical facilities available, they overstate the actual number that can be harvested due to labor availability. See the table on this page for capacity data of sow plants, and those on Pages 20-21 for the same figures for all plants.

Of note in the table below is the lack of a survey response from Smithfield Foods. The company declined to respond, citing pending litigation. Company officials did not specify exactly what litigation caused their concern, but we know of three separate legal issues facing Smithfield.

First are the ongoing appeals of nuisance suits in North Carolina. Second, Smithfield is one defendant in a Minnesota antitrust suit alleging collusion among leading pork packers to fix pork prices. Finally, there is the recently filed suit by Maxwell Foods alleging that Smithfield has not honored a long-standing pricing agreement in recent years.

The data shown for Smithfield on Page 20 are from 2019. In terms of physical capacity, those numbers are still reasonably accurate. Operational capacity is another question, especially for the Tar Heel, N.C., and Gwaltney, Va., plants, which have faced labor shortages that have limited their operations by 20% to 30% of maximum capacity. These shortfalls could, of course, disappear if workers can be secured and attendance improves.

The other major changes from 2019 are a 2,000-head-per-day addition to the capacity of Seaboard's Guymon, Okla., plant and the April opening of 2,100-head-per-day capacity at Iowa Premium Pork's new plant in Luverne, Minn. The WholeStone Farms plant in Fremont, Neb., added 825 head per day to its maximum throughput, but pointed out that "normal" operations are slightly more limited due to its marketing agreement with Hormel and somewhat limited carcass fabrication capabilities.

The largest reduction in capacity this year was at J.H. Routh Packing in Ohio, which went from 4,200 to 2,900 head per day. The major driver of the reduction is labor, but the company views that change as more or less permanent. This plant was purchased in February by Holden Farms of Minnesota and Kalmbach Feeds of Ohio.

The capacity at Martin's Pork Products of Falcon, N.C., is reduced this year to reflect single-shift operations for the past few years, a practice that we will now view as permanent until told differently.

Survey results indicate that the packing sector can handle roughly 512,370 head per weekday if:

- Hogs are plentiful.
- Margins are good.
- Full labor complement is available.

That number would put weekly capacity at 2.77 million head, assuming 5.4 workdays per week. That standard workweek was pegged in the mid-'90s as one at which the hog price impacts of a capacity constraint would be minimal, and I have used it since then to keep year-to-year comparisons consistent. The gain of 12,420 per week amounts to 0.45%.

The rub, of course, comes in determining just how much "capacity" can be utilized. Our ongoing monitoring of the major packers indicates that just over 96% of capacity has been utilized in recent weeks. That number is a vast improvement on the roughly 60% levels in the dark days of late April and early May, when as many as nine plants were closed due to COVID-19 cases, absenteeism and social distancing efforts. Should 96% be as well as the industry can do, maximum throughput for a 5.4day workweek would be 2.66 million head. Market hog inventories, Juneto-August farrowing intentions and recent litter sizes from USDA's June Hogs and Pigs report imply that slaughter hog availability will exceed that level in every non-holiday week for the rest of 2020.

Adding Saturday shifts to get to 5.8 days per week would push that number to 2.85 million head. With weekday operations restricted to 96%, this weekly total would require Saturday operations that harvest 393,500 head. The largest Saturday run since the beginning of the pandemic was 318,305 during the week of June 6. The sector's tight labor situation would suggest that 393,000 might be possible on a Saturday, but that it will definitely not be possible on a regular basis.

Sow slaughter capacity has changed little in the 2020 survey. The only major change is an increase of 250 head per day at Swaggerty Sausage in Kodak, Tenn. Note that about 2,000 head per day of the total 17,115 capacity is used for market hogs at Smithfield Foods' Pine Ridge Farms plant in Des Moines, Iowa.

The net available capacity for sows of 15,115 per day would imply the sector could handle just over 75,575 sows per week on five-day operations. The highest weekly sow slaughter total in 2020 was 70,296 head the week of May 8. The sow subsector does not usually run five full days per week, with some plants having standard operating practices of only running four days per week. NHF
